To Whom It May Concern:

I have been a veterinarian for over 16 years and have worked with many working dogs from various dog training facilities as well as the corrective services and RAAF. I have seen many different methods and training tools used for training of both working dogs and pet dogs. Amongst these training tools are prong collars. I believe that these are a very valuable training tools for certain dogs and without them training and control of certain dogs would not be easily performed. I have never seen any injury from these devices at all, no bruising or skin wounds or damage to a dog's behaviour or personality. I completely support the use of these collars when used by trained individuals.

Kind regards,
